Facts of Case

The worker initiated the request for a determination of her work status working in a private barn, feeding, turning out horses, cleaning equipment, and riding horses in tax year 2018, for which she received Form 1099-MISC. The firm's business is described as a private barn.

The firm's response, signed by the Vice President, indicates the firm is a hobby farm and the worker was seasonal farm help. The worker fed and turned out horses and rendered general horse care.

The worker stated that she was given feeding and riding instructions at the start date. The firm responded the worker shadowed another worker for the day. The work assignments were conveyed via an overall function list for the care of the horses. Both parties acknowledge the firm's barn manager determined the methods by which the worker's services were performed. Any problems or complaints encountered by the worker were directed to the firm's barn manager for resolution. The worker's services of feeding, turning out the horses, cleaning of barns and/or equipment, and general horse care were rendered between 7am to 3pm at the farm. The worker was required to perform the services personally; any additional personnel were hired and paid by the firm.

The firm and worker concur the firm provided grooming equipment, supplies, and feed; the worker furnished nothing and did not incur expenses in the performance of her job. The firm paid the worker an hourly wage. The worker indicated she was not at risk for a financial loss in this work relationship and that she did not establish the level of payment for the services provided.

The worker was not extended any benefits. The worker responded that either party could terminate the work relationship without incurring a liability or penalty. The work relationship ended when the worker went back to school.

Analysis

A worker who is required to comply with another person's instructions about when, where, and how he or she is to work is ordinarily an employee. This control factor is present if the person or persons for whom the services are performed have the right to require compliance with instructions. Some employees may work without receiving instructions because they are highly proficient and conscientious workers or because the duties are so simple or familiar to them. Furthermore, the instructions, that show how to reach the desired results, may have been oral and given only once at the beginning of the relationship.

Training a worker by requiring an experienced employee to work with the worker, by corresponding with the worker, by requiring the worker to attend meetings, or by using other methods, indicates that the person or persons for whom the services are performed want the services performed in a particular method or manner. This is true even if the training was only given once at the beginning of the work relationship.

If the services must be rendered personally, presumably the person or persons for whom the services are performed are interested in the methods used to accomplish the work as well as in the results.

Payment by the hour, week, or month generally points to an employer-employee relationship, provided that this method of payment is not just a convenient way of paying a lump sum agreed upon as the cost of a job. In such instances, the firm assumes the hazard that the services of the worker will be proportionate to the regular payments. This action warrants the assumption that, to protect its investment, the firm has the right to direct and control the performance of the workers. Also, workers are assumed to be employees if they are guaranteed a minimum salary or are given a drawing account of a specified amount that need not be repaid when it exceeds earnings.

A person who can realize a profit or suffer a loss as a result of his or her services is generally an independent contractor, while the person who cannot is an employee. "Profit or loss" implies the use of capital by a person in an independent business of his or her own. The risk that a worker will not receive payment for his or her services, however, is common to both independent contractors and employees and, thus, does not constitute a sufficient economic risk to support treatment as an independent contractor. If a worker loses payment from the firm's customer for poor work, the firm shares the risk of such loss. Control of the firm over the worker would be necessary in order to reduce the risk of financial loss to the firm. The opportunity for higher earnings or of gain or loss from a commission arrangement is not considered profit or loss.

We have considered the information provided by both parties to this work relationship. In this case, the firm retained the right to change the worker's methods and to direct the worker to the extent necessary to protect its financial investment and business reputation and to ensure the needs of the horses were met. The worker was not operating a separate and distinct business; the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks, and therefore, did not have the opportunity to realize a profit or incur a loss as a result of the services provided. Integration of the worker's services into the business operations generally shows that the worker is subject to direction and control. When the success or continuation of a business depends to an appreciable degree upon the performance of certain services, the workers who perform those services must necessarily be subject to a certain amount of control by the owner of the business. In this case, the worker was not engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather the services performed by the worker were a necessary and integral part of the firm's business.

For federal income tax withholding and social security, Medicare, and federal unemployment (FUTA) tax purposes, there are no differences among full-time employees, part-time employees, and employees hired for short periods. It does not matter whether the worker has another job or has the maximum amount of social security tax withheld by another employer.

CONCLUSION

We conclude that the firm had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business.
