

SS-8 Determination—Determination for Public Inspection

Occupation 03FMW Factory or Mill Workers	Determination: <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Employee <input type="checkbox"/> Contractor
UILC	Third Party Communication: <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> None <input type="checkbox"/> Yes

I have read Notice 441 and am requesting:

- Additional redactions based on categories listed in section entitled "Deletions We May Have Made to Your Original Determination Letter"
- Delay based on an on-going transaction
- 90 day delay

For IRS Use Only:

Facts of Case

The worker initiated the request for a determination of his work status as a woodworker – milling and cutting raw lumber for fabrication into various products in tax years 2015 to 2018 for which he received Form 1099-MISC. The firm’s business is described as providing structures, substrates, and other wood products and services to fine artists.

The firm’s response was signed by the president. The firm’s business is a small workshop building platforms for various creative artists. The worker provided services building platforms.

The firm and worker indicated the worker was given instructions as to basic designs of lumber processing methods and product fabrication methods; the firm stated the worker was free to adjust procedures and techniques to reach the goal. The worker was given the job assignments on order forms from the firm. All orders were submitted to and subject to the approval of the firm. Both parties agreed that they collaborated as to the methods by which the worker’s services were performed. Any problems or complaints encountered by the worker were directed to the firm for resolution. The services were generally rendered Monday to Thursday between 8am and 4-6pm with a ½ hour break, with additional hours and days, as needed to meet timeframes/deadlines. The worker was required to perform the services personally; any additional personnel were hired and paid by the firm.

The parties concur that the firm provided the facility with machinery, lumber, hardware, tools, canvas, and coatings. The worker furnished personal safety items. The worker did not lease equipment, space, or a facility. The firm paid the worker an hourly wage; the customers paid the firm. The worker was not covered under the firm’s workers’ compensation insurance policy. The firm and worker agree that the worker was not at risk for a financial loss in this work relationship and it was the firm that established the level of payment for services provided and products sold.

The firm and worker acknowledged that there were no benefits of health insurance, paid vacations, or paid holidays; however, the worker stated he received personal days and bonuses. Either party could terminate the work relationship without incurring a liability or penalty. The worker was not performing same or similar services for others during the same time frame. The worker was referred to as an assistant. The worker resigned his position.

Analysis

A worker who is required to comply with another person's instructions about when, where, and how he or she is to work is ordinarily an employee. This control factor is present if the person or persons for whom the services are performed have the right to require compliance with instructions. Some employees may work without receiving instructions because they are highly proficient and conscientious workers or because the duties are so simple or familiar to them. Furthermore, the instructions, that show how to reach the desired results, may have been oral and given only once at the beginning of the relationship.

If the services must be rendered personally, presumably the person or persons for whom the services are performed are interested in the methods used to accomplish the work as well as in the results.

A continuing relationship between the worker and the person or persons for whom the services are performed indicates that an employer-employee relationship exists. A continuing relationship may exist where work is performed in frequently recurring although irregular intervals.

Payment by the hour, week, or month generally points to an employer-employee relationship, provided that this method of payment is not just a convenient way of paying a lump sum agreed upon as the cost of a job. In such instances, the firm assumes the hazard that the services of the worker will be proportionate to the regular payments. This action warrants the assumption that, to protect its investment, the firm has the right to direct and control the performance of the workers. Also, workers are assumed to be employees if they are guaranteed a minimum salary or are given a drawing account of a specified amount that need not be repaid when it exceeds earnings.

The fact that the person or persons for whom the services are performed furnish significant tools, materials, and other equipment tends to show the existence of an employer-employee relationship.

A person who can realize a profit or suffer a loss as a result of his or her services is generally an independent contractor, while the person who cannot is an employee. "Profit or loss" implies the use of capital by a person in an independent business of his or her own. The risk that a worker will not receive payment for his or her services, however, is common to both independent contractors and employees and, thus, does not constitute a sufficient economic risk to support treatment as an independent contractor. If a worker loses payment from the firm's customer for poor work, the firm shares the risk of such loss. Control of the firm over the worker would be necessary in order to reduce the risk of financial loss to the firm. The opportunity for higher earnings or of gain or loss from a commission arrangement is not considered profit or loss.

We have considered the information provided by both parties to this work relationship. In this case, the firm retained the right to change the worker's methods and to direct the worker to the extent necessary to protect its financial investment and business reputation and to ensure its customers' satisfaction and that its contractual obligations were met. The worker was not operating a separate and distinct business; the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks, and therefore, did not have the opportunity to realize a profit or incur a loss as a result of the services provided. Integration of the worker's services into the business operations generally shows that the worker is subject to direction and control. When the success or continuation of a business depends to an appreciable degree upon the performance of certain services, the workers who perform those services must necessarily be subject to a certain amount of control by the owner of the business. In this case, the worker was not engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather the services performed by the worker were a necessary and integral part of the firm's business.

CONCLUSION

Based on the above analysis, we conclude that the firm had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business.