Facts of Case

The worker submitted a request for a determination of worker status in regard to services performed for this firm, from January 2018 to April 2019. The firm issued the worker Form 1099-MISC for the years in question. The worker filed Form SS-8 as he believes he received Form 1099-MISC in error.

The firm's response states its business specializes in the installation of tile flooring. The firm stated that the worker performed services as a construction helper. The worker was classified as an independent contractor due to being able to perform services for others. There was no written agreement between the two parties.

The firm did not provide specific training and/or instruction to the worker. The firm provided work assignments to the worker. The firm determined the methods by which assignments were completed. The firm was responsible for problem or complaint resolution. The worker's schedule was 8:00 am until assignments were completed. The worker was not required to attend any meetings or complete reports. The worker was required to provide services personally. The firm was responsible for the hiring of substitutes or helpers.

The firm provided all materials, supplies, property, and most equipment. The worker did not lease any equipment, space, or a facility from the firm. The worker incurred no expenses in the performance of his services. The worker was paid an hourly rate of pay; a drawing account for advances was not allowed. The firm established the level of payment for the services provided or products sold, and customers paid the firm. The firm did not carry workers' compensation insurance on the worker.

No benefits were made available to the worker. The work relationship could be terminated by either party without incurring a liability or penalty. The worker did not perform similar services for others. The worker did not advertise or maintain a business listing. The worker was represented as a member of the firm. The worker ended the work relationship.

Analysis

Generally, the relationship of employer and employee exists when the person for whom the services are performed has the right to control and direct the individual who performs the services, not only as to what is to be done, but also how it is to be done. It is not necessary that the employer actually direct or control the individual, it is sufficient if he or she has the right to do so.

Section 31.3121(d)-1(a)(3) of the regulations provides that if the relationship of an employer and employee exists, the designation or description of the parties as anything other than that of employer and employee is immaterial. Thus, if an employer-employee relationship exists, any contractual designation of the employee as a partner, coadventurer, agent, or independent contractor must be disregarded.

Therefore, a statement that a worker is an independent contractor is without merit. For federal employment tax purposes, it is the actual working relationship that is controlling and not the terms of the contract (oral or written) between the parties. Furthermore, whether there is an employment relationship is a question of fact and not subject to negotiation between the parties.

In general, domestic services include services of a household nature in or about a private home performed by cooks, waiters, butlers, housekeepers, maids, valets, babysitters, janitors, laundresses, caretakers, handymen, gardeners, grooms, chauffeurs of family-use vehicles, and companions for convalescents, the elderly, or the disabled. A private home is a fixed place of abode of an individual or family.

If the services must be rendered personally, presumably the person or persons for whom the services are performed are interested in the methods used to accomplish the work as well as in the results. In this case, the payer required the worker to personally perform services. Furthermore, the services performed by the worker were integral to the payer's childcare needs. The payer provided work assignments, determined the methods by which assignments were performed, and assumed responsibility for problem resolution. These facts evidence the payer retained the right to direct and control the worker to the extent necessary to ensure satisfactory job performance in a manner acceptable to the payer. Based on the worker's education, past work experience, and work ethic the payer may not have needed to frequently exercise its right to direct and control the worker; however, the facts evidence the payer retained the right to do so if needed.

Payment by the hour, week, or month generally points to an employer-employee relationship, provided that this method of payment is not just a convenient way of paying a lump sum agreed upon as the cost of a job. In such instances, the payer assumes the hazard that the services of the worker will be proportionate to the regular payments. This action warrants the assumption that, to protect its investment, the payer has the right to direct and control the performance of the workers. In this case, the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks. Based on the hourly rate of pay arrangement the worker could not realize a profit or incur a loss.

Factors that illustrate how the parties perceive their relationship include the intent of the parties as expressed in written contracts; the provision of, or lack of employee benefits; the right of the parties to terminate the relationship; the permanency of the relationship; and whether the services performed are part of the service recipient's regular business activities. In this case, the worker was not engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather the services performed by the worker were a necessary and integral part of the payer's household needs. Both parties retained the right to terminate the work relationship at any time without incurring a liability. There is no evidence to suggest the worker performed similar services for others as an independent contractor or advertised business services to the general public during the term of this work relationship. The classification of a worker as an independent contractor should not be based primarily on the fact that a worker's services may be used on a temporary, part-time, or as-needed basis. As noted above, common law factors are considered when examining the worker classification issue.

Based on the above analysis, we conclude that the payer had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business.

The payer can obtain additional information related to worker classification online at www.irs.gov; Publication 4341 and Publication 926.
