For IRS Use Only:Facts of Case

Information provided indicated the firm is a nail salon. The worker performed services as a nail technician. The firm reported the income earned on Form 1099-MISC for tax year 2017. The firm indicated the worker was a partner under the worker name and agreed to receive Form 1099-MISC. The firm indicated she set her own hours. The firm indicated they provided the space and utilities. The worker provided her equipment, nails and supplies. The firm indicated the worker did not lease space or equipment. The firm stated the worker was paid on piece work. The clients paid the firm. The firm stated it did carry workmen's compensation insurance. Either party could terminate the work relationship without incurring a penalty or liability. The firm indicated the worker quit.

The worker indicated she was treated as an employee in 2016. The firm was sold in 2017 and was then changed to contract status at that time, without discussion or consultation. The services performed did not change. The worker indicated some instructions were given on an ongoing basis. The firm owner directed nail technicians to specific customers. She indicated she performed services five days per week from eleven am to seven pm. All work was performed on the firm premises. The worker indicated the firm provided the polis, files, buffers and other manicure / pedicure supplies. She provided nothing. She agreed she did not lease space or equipment. She was paid on a commission basis both in 2016 and 2017. She was also given an employee discount for services received. She agreed the customer paid the firm. The firm determined the prices charged to the clients. Either party could terminate the work relationship without incurring a penalty or liability. The worker stated she left to pursue other venues.

ANALYSIS

The question of whether an individual is an independent contractor or an employee is one that is determined through consideration of the facts of a particular case along with the application of law and regulations for worker classification issues, known as "common law." Common law flows chiefly from court decisions and is a major part of the justice system of the United States. Under the common law, the treatment of a worker as an independent contractor or an employee originates from the legal definitions developed in the law and it depends on the payer's right to direct and control the worker in the performance of his or her duties. Section 3121(d)(2) of the Code provides that the term "employee" means any individual defined as an employee by using the usual common law rules.

Generally, the relationship of employer and employee exists when the person for whom the services are performed has the right to control and direct the individual who performs the services, not only as to what is to be done, but also how it is to be done. It is not necessary that the employer actually direct or control the individual, it is sufficient if he or she has the right to do so.

In determining whether an individual is an employee or an independent contractor under the common law, all evidence of both control and lack of control or independence must be considered. We must examine the relationship of the worker and the business. We consider facts that show a right to direct or control how the worker performs the specific tasks for which he or she is hired, who controls the financial aspects of the worker's activities, and how the parties perceive their relationship. The degree of importance of each factor varies depending on the occupation and the context in which the services are performed.

Therefore, your statement that the worker was an independent contractor pursuant to an agreement is without merit. For federal employment tax purposes, it is the actual working relationship that is controlling and not the terms of the contract (oral or written) between the parties.

-Integration of the worker's services into the business operations generally shows that the worker is subject to direction and control. When the success or continuation of a business depends to an appreciable degree upon the performance of certain services, the workers who perform those services must necessarily be subject to a certain amount of control by the owner of the business.

-The fact that the person or persons for whom the services are performed furnish significant tools, materials, and other equipment tends to show the existence of an employer-employee relationship. Lack of significant investment by a person in facilities or equipment used in performing services for another indicates dependence on the employer and, accordingly, the existence of an employer-employee relationship. The term "significant investment" does not include tools, instruments, and clothing commonly provided by employees in their trade; nor does it include education, experience, or training. Also, if the firm has the right to control the equipment, it is unlikely the worker had an investment in facilities.

Analysis

We have applied the above law to the information submitted. As is the case in almost all worker classification cases, some facts point to an employment relationship while other facts indicate independent contractor status. The determination of the worker's status, then, rests on the weight given to the factors, keeping in mind that no one factor rules. The degree of importance of each factor varies depending on the occupation and the circumstances.

Evidence of control generally falls into three categories: behavioral control, financial control, and relationship of the parties, which are collectively referred to as the categories of evidence. In weighing the evidence, careful consideration has been given to the factors outlined below.

Factors that illustrate whether there is a right to control how a worker performs a task include training and instructions. In this case, you retained the right to change the worker's methods and to direct the worker to the extent necessary to protect your financial investment.

Factors that illustrate whether there is a right to direct and control the financial aspects of the worker's activities include significant investment, unreimbursed expenses, the methods of payment, and the opportunity for profit or loss. In this case, the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks, and therefore, did not have the opportunity to realize a profit or incur a loss as a result of the services provided.

Factors that illustrate how the parties perceive their relationship include the intent of the parties as expressed in written contracts; the provision of, or lack of employee benefits; the right of the parties to terminate the relationship; the permanency of the relationship; and whether the services performed are part of the service recipient's regular business activities. In this case, the worker was not engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather the services performed by the worker were a necessary and integral part of your business. Both parties retained the right to terminate the work relationship at any time without incurring a liability.

CONCLUSION

Based on the above analysis, we conclude that the firm had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business. All work was performed under the firm's business name. The worker did not lease the space. Whether or not she provided her materials, since she is a nail technician, those materials would have been deemed tools of the trade, and not a financial investment, such as the building lease, utilities etc. The firm determined the rate of pay and the customers paid the firm not the worker.
