For IRS Use Only:

Facts of Case

The worker initiated the request for a determination of his work status as a laborer in tax year 2018, for which he received Form 1099-MISC. The worker was hired as a laborer restoring damage from water, mold, and fire. The worker stated he had no experience in this field. The firm's business is described as a restoration company.

The firm's response was signed by the COO. The firm's business is insurance restoration and remediation, general contracting. The worker provided services as a laborer. The firm stated the worker, who had zero experience, was hired on a 90-day probationary period, with an opportunity to prove himself. The worker was issued Form 1099-MISC for the probationary period and then put on payroll through a payroll company.

The firm and worker acknowledge the worker's lack of experience; therefore, he was given hands-on training and instructions and shadowed crew members. The worker's job assignments were decided by a supervisor. The firm determined the methods by which the worker's services were performed. Any problems or complaints encountered by the worker were directed to the firm for resolution. The worker arrived at the company location and then was sent to a customer location/various job sites. The worker was required to perform the services personally; any additional personnel were hired and paid by the firm.

The firm responded that the worker was provided the job assignment location and transportation with the crew, if needed. The worker indicated the firm provided vehicles, tools, machinery, and clothing. The worker furnished nothing. The worker did not lease equipment, space, or a facility. The firm paid the worker an hourly wage; customers paid the firm. The worker was covered under the firm's workers' compensation insurance policy. The worker was not at risk for a financial loss in this work relationship. The firm responded that the worker did negotiate the hourly rate of payment for services provided; the worker disagreed.

There were no benefits extended to the worker in the first 90-days; the worker added that he was eligible for paid vacations, holidays, sick pay, bonuses and on-call pay for weekends. Either party could terminate the work relationship without incurring a liability or penalty. The worker was not performing same or similar services for others during the same time frame. The firm responded the worker was considered a vendor/contractor for the probationary period. Both parties agree the firm terminated the worker; the worker stated because he could not perform the tasks that he was hired for and he could not pass an exam to secure a foreman position with their company, he was fired and at that time the firm took back their company truck, shirts, and business cards.

Analysis

A worker who is required to comply with another person's instructions about when, where, and how he or she is to work is ordinarily an employee. This control factor is present if the person or persons for whom the services are performed have the right to require compliance with instructions. Some employees may work without receiving instructions because they are highly proficient and conscientious workers or because the duties are so simple or familiar to them. Furthermore, the instructions, that show how to reach the desired results, may have been oral and given only once at the beginning of the relationship.

Training a worker by requiring an experienced employee to work with the worker, by corresponding with the worker, by requiring the worker to attend meetings, or by using other methods, indicates that the person or persons for whom the services are performed want the services performed in a particular method or manner. This is true even if the training was only given once at the beginning of the work relationship.

If the services must be rendered personally, presumably the person or persons for whom the services are performed are interested in the methods used to accomplish the work as well as in the results.

Payment by the hour, week, or month generally points to an employer-employee relationship, provided that this method of payment is not just a convenient way of paying a lump sum agreed upon as the cost of a job. In such instances, the firm assumes the hazard that the services of the worker will be proportionate to the regular payments. This action warrants the assumption that, to protect its investment, the firm has the right to direct and control the performance of the workers. Also, workers are assumed to be employees if they are guaranteed a minimum salary or are given a drawing account of a specified amount that need not be repaid when it exceeds earnings.

The fact that the person or persons for whom the services are performed furnish significant tools, materials, and other equipment tends to show the existence of an employer-employee relationship.

A person who can realize a profit or suffer a loss as a result of his or her services is generally an independent contractor, while the person who cannot is an employee. "Profit or loss" implies the use of capital by a person in an independent business of his or her own. The risk that a worker will not receive payment for his or her services, however, is common to both independent contractors and employees and, thus, does not constitute a sufficient economic risk to support treatment as an independent contractor. If a worker loses payment from the firm's customer for poor work, the firm shares the risk of such loss. Control of the firm over the worker would be necessary in order to reduce the risk of financial loss to the firm.

We have considered the information provided by both parties to this work relationship. In this case, the firm retained the right to change the worker's methods and to direct the worker to the extent necessary to protect its financial investment and business reputation and to ensure its customers' satisfaction and that its contractual obligations were met. The worker was hired with no experience. The worker was not operating a separate and distinct business; the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks, and therefore, did not have the opportunity to realize a profit or incur a loss as a result of the services provided. Integration of the worker's services into the business operations generally shows that the worker is subject to direction and control. When the success or continuation of a business depends to an appreciable degree upon the performance of certain services, the workers who perform those services must necessarily be subject to a certain amount of control by the owner of the business. In this case, the worker was not engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather the services performed by the worker were a necessary and integral part of the firm's business.

CONCLUSION

Based on the above analysis, we conclude that the firm had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business.
