The firm is a home medical equipment and durable medical equipment supplier. The worker was engaged to perform services as a delivery technician to deliver products and perform repair services. The firm treated the worker status as independent contractor, and issued to the worker a Form 1099-MISC at year-end to report the monies received for his services as non-employee compensation.

The firm provided the worker with on the job training. The worker received work assignments via printed delivery tickets and service call sheets. The worker and firm both determined the work methods by which to perform the services. The worker reported problems and complaints to the firm for resolution purposes. The firm required the worker to perform his services personally, at the firm's office location, and at customer locations. The worker was required to provide the firm with signed delivery tickets and service call sheets.

The firm provided the worker with the van, fuel, warehouse facilities, tools, equipment and supplies needed to perform his services. The firm provided the worker with a company fuel card for expenses incurred in the performance of his services. The worker did not incur economic loss or financial risks related to the services he performed for the firm. The firm paid the worker on an hourly wage basis for his services. Customers paid the firm for services rendered.

The firm did not cover the worker under workers' compensation insurance. Employment benefits were not made available to the worker. The worker did not perform similar services for others while engaged by the firm, nor did he personally advertise his services to the public. The work relationship was continuous, and could have been terminated by either party at any time without incurring liabilities.

Analysis

The facts provided for this case do not evidence the worker's behavioral control of the work relationship. The worker followed the firm's instructions, training, work methods, schedule, and routine in the performance of his services. The worker's services were performed personally at locations designated by the firm. The worker used the firm's facilities, equipment, tools and supplies, and represented the firm's business operations in the performance of his services. As a result, the firm retained the right to direct and control the worker to the extent necessary to protect its investment, and the reputation of its business operations.

The facts provided for this case do not evidence the worker's financial control of the work relationship. The worker's remuneration was established by the firm. The worker had no opportunity for profit or loss as a result of the services performed for the firm. "Profit or loss" implies the use of capital by a person in an independent business of his or her own. The worker did not have a significant investment in the facilities, equipment, tools, or supplies used to perform services for the firm. The term "significant investment" does not include tools, instruments, and clothing commonly provided by employees in their trade; nor does it include education, experience, or training. Also, if the firm has the right to control the equipment, it is unlikely the worker had an investment in facilities.

The worker performed services as requested by the firm, for an indefinite period of time, and both parties retained the right to terminate the work relationship at any time without incurring liabilities. The facts provided for this case do not evidence that the worker was engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather show that the worker's services were performed as a necessary and integral part of the firm's business operations. Integration of the worker's services into the business operations generally shows that the worker is subject to direction and control. When the success or continuation of a business depends to an appreciable degree upon the performance of certain services, the workers who perform those services must necessarily be subject to a certain amount of control by the owner of the business.

Based on common law principles, the worker shall be found to be an employee for Federal employment tax purposes. For correction assistance, you may refer to Publication 4341, which can be obtained at www.irs.gov
