Facts of Case

The worker requested a determination of employment status for services performed for the firm in 2013-2014 as a motel room cleaner. The firm operates a motel and responded to our request for information.

The worker stated she also did laundry, worked the front desk, took reservations and waited on customers. The worker stated she had performed the same services for the firm in 2011.

The firm stated that the worker provided cleaning services for the motel under the name [REDACTED]. The firm stated that the worker asked to be an independent contractor. The worker did not receive any training as she knew how to clean. She was told which room to clean each day. The worker determined her own methods and only reported problems to the firm that she could not handle herself. She did not have to turn in any reports. Hours worked depended on the number of rooms she had to clean. The worker did not have to attend any meetings or complete any reports. All services were performed at the motel. She did not need any helpers. Everything the worker needed was supplied by the firm. The worker received an hourly rate. Either party could have terminated without liability. The firm stated that the worker took her lunch and breaks when she wanted. She also left for doctors appointments and other errands. The firm stated that they tried to tell her how to improve something with regard to her cleaning and she became defensive. She also texted them 10 minutes before she was to start working and quit. The firm feels this would have not been tolerated if she was an employee.

Analysis

We have applied the above law to the information submitted. As is the case in almost all worker classification cases, some facts point to an employment relationship while other facts indicate independent contractor status. The determination of the worker's status, then, rests on the weight given to the factors, keeping in mind that no one factor rules. The degree of importance of each factor varies depending on the occupation and the circumstances.

Evidence of control generally falls into three categories: behavioral control, financial control, and relationship of the parties, which are collectively referred to as the categories of evidence. In weighing the evidence, careful consideration has been given to the factors outlined below.

You stated that the worker wanted to be an independent contractor so you entered into an oral agreement. Your statement that the worker was an independent contractor pursuant to an agreement is without merit. For federal employment tax purposes, it is the actual working relationship that is controlling and not the terms of the contract (oral or written) between the parties.

Factors that illustrate whether there is a right to control how a worker performs a task include training and instructions. In this case, you retained the right to change the worker's methods and to direct the worker to the extent necessary to protect your business. A worker who is required to comply with another person's instructions about when, where, and how he or she is to work is ordinarily an employee. This control factor is present if the person or persons for whom the services are performed have the right to require compliance with instructions. Some employees may work without receiving instructions because they are highly proficient and conscientious workers or because the duties are so simple or familiar to them. Furthermore, the instructions, that show how to reach the desired results, may have been oral and given only once at the beginning of the relationship. The worker received her assignments from the firm and reported to the firm when problems occurred.

Factors that illustrate whether there is a right to direct and control the financial aspects of the worker's activities include significant investment, unreimbursed expenses, the methods of payment, and the opportunity for profit or loss. In this case, the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks, and therefore, did not have the opportunity to realize a profit or incur a loss as a result of the services provided. The firm provided all the materials, equipment, and supplies the worker needed. Lack of significant investment by a person in facilities or equipment used in performing services for another indicates dependence on the employer and, accordingly, the existence of an employer-employee relationship. The term "significant investment" does not include tools, instruments, and clothing commonly provided by employees in their trade; nor does it include education, experience, or training. Also, if the firm has the right to control the equipment, it is unlikely the worker had an investment in facilities.

A person who can realize a profit or suffer a loss as a result of his or her services is generally an independent contractor, while the person who cannot is an employee. "Profit or loss" implies the use of capital by a person in an independent business of his or her own. The risk that a worker will not receive payment for his or her services, however, is common to both independent contractors and employees and, thus, does not constitute a sufficient economic risk to support treatment as an independent contractor. If a worker loses payment from the firm's customer for poor work, the firm shares the risk of such loss. Control of the firm over the worker would be necessary in order to reduce the risk of financial loss to the firm. The opportunity for higher earnings or of gain or loss from a commission arrangement is not considered profit or loss. The worker had no investment in the firm's business, received an hourly rate, and could not suffer a loss.

Based on the above analysis, we conclude that the firm had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business.
