Facts of Case

The firm is a commercial construction business, providing drywall, framing, insulation, taping, millwork, doors, and hardware services for its customers. The worker was engaged to perform services as a carpenter, to perform such services as framing, drywall, demolition, and ceiling work. The firm treated the worker status as independent contractor, and issued to the worker a Form 1099-MISC at year-end to report the monies received for his services as non-employee compensation.

The firm provided the worker with job specific details of what needed to be done, and what the deadlines were for each project. The worker had the option to accept or decline any work the firm made available to him. The firm and worker both determined the work methods by which to perform the services. The firm resolved work related issues. The firm required the worker to perform his services personally, at its customer locations.

The firm provided the materials needed for a job, and the general contractor provided for the scaffolding. The worker provided his own tools and tool belt. The worker did not incur work related expenses. There was no information provided in this case to support that the worker incurred economic loss or financial risks related to the services he performed for the firm. The firm paid the worker on an hourly wage basis. Customers paid the firm for services rendered.

The firm did not carry workers' compensation insurance on the worker. Christmas bonuses were made available to the worker. There was no information provided to support that other employment benefits were made available to the worker. There was no information provided to support that the worker performed similar services for others, or that he advertised his services to others while engaged by the firm. The work relationship was continuous until such time the worker terminated his services for the firm.

Analysis

The facts provided for this case do not evidence the worker's behavioral control of the work relationship. The worker followed the firm's instructions, work methods, schedule, and routine in the performance of his services. The worker's services were performed personally, at locations designated by the firm. The worker used equipment, tools, and supplies provided to him, and he represented the firm's business operations in the performance of his services. As a result, the firm retained the right to direct and control the worker to the extent necessary to protect its investment, and the reputation of its business operations.

The facts provided for this case do not evidence the worker's financial control of the work relationship. The worker's remuneration was established by the firm. The worker had no opportunity for profit or loss as a result of the services performed for the firm. "Profit or loss" implies the use of capital by a person in an independent business of his or her own. The worker did not have a significant investment in the facilities, equipment, tools, or supplies used to perform his services for the firm. The term "significant investment" does not include tools, instruments, and clothing commonly provided by employees in their trade; nor does it include education, experience, or training. Also, if the firm has the right to control the equipment, it is unlikely the worker had an investment in facilities.

The worker performed services as requested by the firm, for an indefinite period of time, and both parties retained the right to terminate the work relationship at any time without incurring liabilities. The facts provided for this case do not evidence that the worker was engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather show that he performed his services as a necessary and integral part of the firm's business operations. Integration of the worker's services into the business operations generally shows that the worker is subject to direction and control. When the success or continuation of a business depends to an appreciable degree upon the performance of certain services, the workers who perform those services must necessarily be subject to a certain amount of control by the owner of the business.

Based on common law principles, the worker shall be found to be an employee for Federal employment tax purposes. For correction assistance, you may refer to Publication 4341, which can be obtained at www.irs.gov
