Facts of Case

It is our usual practice in cases of this type to solicit information from both parties involved. Upon the submission of the Form SS-8 from the worker, we requested information from the firm concerning this work relationship. The firm responded to our request for completion of Form SS-8.

From the information provided the firm is a food service business and the worker performed services for the firm as a cook in 2016. The firm believes the worker was an independent contractor while performing services for them because he was told when he was hired that he was a subcontractor and would get a 1099 at year end. The firm reported the worker's earnings on a Form 1099-MISC.

The worker was required to notify the firm if any problems or complaints arose on the job site for their resolution. The firm states the worker performed his services from 12:30 to 8:00 p.m. five (5) days a week at their client's location.

All equipment, supplies, and materials were provided to the worker in order to perform his services. The worker did not incur expenses, clients paid the firm for services rendered by the worker, and the firm paid the worker at an hourly rate. The worker did not establish the level of payment for the services provided.

The worker was not eligible for employee benefits. The firm states the worker performed similar services for others but did not advertise his services to the public as being in business. Either party could terminate the work relationship at any time without either party incurring a liability. The firm states the worker terminated the work relationship.

Analysis

As in this case and in almost all worker classification cases, some facts point to an employment relationship while other facts indicate independent contractor status. The determination of the worker's status, then, rests on the weight given to the factors, keeping in mind that no one factor rules. The degree of importance of each factor varies depending on the occupation and the circumstances.

Evidence of control generally falls into three categories: behavioral control, financial control, and relationship of the parties, which are collectively referred to as the categories of evidence. In weighing the evidence, careful consideration has been given to the factors outlined below.

Factors that illustrate whether there is a right to control how a worker performs a task include training and instructions. In this case, the worker was experienced in this line of work and did not require training or detailed instructions from the firm. The need to direct and control a worker and his services should not be confused with the right to direct and control. The worker provided his services on behalf of and under the firm's business name rather than an entity of his own. The firm was responsible for the quality of the work performed by the worker and for the satisfaction of their clients. This gave the firm the right to direct and control the worker and his services in order to protect their financial investment, their business reputation, and their relationship with their clients.

Factors that illustrate whether there is a right to direct and control the financial aspects of the worker's activities include significant investment, unreimbursed expenses, the methods of payment, and the opportunity for profit or loss. In this case, the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks, and therefore, did not have the opportunity to realize a profit or incur a loss as a result of the services provided. "Profit or loss" implies the use of capital by a person in an independent business of his or her own. The risk that a worker will not receive payment for his or her services, however, is common to both independent contractors and employees and, thus, does not constitute a sufficient economic risk to support treatment as an independent contractor. If a worker loses payment from the firm's customer for poor work, the firm shares the risk of such loss. Control of the firm over the worker would be necessary in order to reduce the risk of financial loss to the firm. The opportunity for higher earnings or of gain or loss from a commission arrangement is not considered profit or loss.

Factors that illustrate how the parties perceive their relationship include the intent of the parties as expressed in written contracts; the provision of, or lack of employee benefits; the right of the parties to terminate the relationship; the permanency of the relationship; and whether the services performed are part of the service recipient's regular business activities. In this case, the worker was not engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather the services performed by the worker were a necessary and integral part of the firm's business. Both parties retained the right to terminate the work relationship at any time without incurring a liability.

If a firm has to make a worker "understand" or "agree to" being an independent contractor (as in a verbal or written agreement or the filing of a Form W-9), then the worker is not an independent contractor. An individual knows they are in business for themselves offering their services to the public and does not need to be made aware of, understand, or agree to be an independent contractor.

Section 31.3121(d)-1(a)(3) of the regulations provides that if the relationship of an employer and employee exists, the designation or description of the parties as anything other than that of employer and employee is immaterial. Thus, if an employer-employee relationship exists, any contractual designation of the employee as a partner, co-adventurer, agent, or independent contractor must be disregarded.

Therefore, the firm's statement that the worker was an independent contractor pursuant to an agreement is without merit. For federal employment tax purposes, it is the actual working relationship that is controlling and not the terms of the contract (oral or written) between the parties.

If a worker performs more than de minimis services for a multiple of unrelated persons or firms at the same time, that factor generally indicates that the worker is an independent contractor. However, there was no evidence presented nor found in this investigation that indicates that the worker had an investment in a business related to the services he performed for the firm and offering those services to the public. It should be noted that it is possible for a person to work for a number of people or firms concurrently due to financial need and the supporting of oneself and be an employee of one or all of whom engages him.

Based on the above analysis, we conclude that the firm had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business.
