Facts of Case

It is our usual practice in cases of this type to solicit information from both parties involved. Upon the submission of the Form SS-8 from the worker, we requested information from the firm concerning this work relationship. The firm's owner responded to our request for completion of Form SS-8.

From the information provided the firm is in the business of providing relief veterinary technician services and the worker was engaged under a verbal agreement to perform services as a veterinary technician. The worker was required to personally perform her services at an emergency animal clinic. The firm states they provided no training to the worker and she chose the day and times she wanted to work. The firm states the worker determined how she performed her services and she and the veterinarian on duty would handle any problems or complaints that arose. The worker documented the animals' charts but was not required to submit any additional reports to the firm. The worker's routine was to perform her services in the evenings or overnight hours at the emergency animal clinic.

The firm states they provided no equipment, supplies, or materials to the worker in order to perform her services. The worker provided and incurred expenses for her uniform. The clients paid the firm for services rendered by the worker and the firm paid the worker at an hourly rate. The firm states they determined the worker's rate of pay. The firm did not carry workers' compensation insurance on the worker. The worker did not have an investment in a business related to services performed and she did not have an opportunity to incur a loss or realize a profit as a result of her services. The firm reported the worker's earnings on Forms 1099-MISC.

The firm states the worker was not eligible for employee benefits. The worker did not perform similar services for others and she did not advertise her services. Either party could terminate the work relationship at any time without either party incurring a liability.

Analysis

As is the case in almost all worker classification cases, some facts point to an employment relationship while other facts indicate independent contractor status. The determination of the worker's status, then, rests on the weight given to the factors, keeping in mind that no one factor rules. The degree of importance of each factor varies depending on the occupation and the circumstances.

Evidence of control generally falls into three categories: behavioral control, financial control, and relationship of the parties, which are collectively referred to as the categories of evidence. In weighing the evidence, careful consideration has been given to the factors outlined below.

Factors that illustrate whether there is a right to control how a worker performs a task include training and instructions. In this case, the worker was experienced in this line of work and did not require training or detailed instructions from the firm. The need to direct and control a worker and her services should not be confused with the right to direct and control. The worker provided her services on behalf of and under the firm's business name rather than an entity of her own. The firm was responsible for the quality of the work performed by the worker and for the satisfaction of their clients. This gave the firm the right to direct and control the worker and her services in order to protect their financial investment, their business reputation, and their relationship with their clients.

While the firm states the worker chose the days and times she wanted to work this in and of itself does not determine the worker's status as an independent contractor. The whole relationship needed to be analyzed to determine the worker's correct employment tax status.

Factors that illustrate whether there is a right to direct and control the financial aspects of the worker's activities include significant investment, unreimbursed expenses, the methods of payment, and the opportunity for profit or loss. In this case, the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks, and therefore, did not have the opportunity to realize a profit or incur a loss as a result of the services provided.

Factors that illustrate how the parties perceive their relationship include the intent of the parties as expressed in written contracts; the provision of, or lack of employee benefits; the right of the parties to terminate the relationship; the permanency of the relationship; and whether the services performed are part of the service recipient's regular business activities. In this case, the worker was not engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather the services performed by the worker were a necessary and integral part of the firm's business. Both parties retained the right to terminate the work relationship at any time without incurring a liability.

The firm's statement that the worker performed services on an as-needed basis and therefore, an independent contractor is without merit as both employees (seasonal) and independent contractors can perform services when the needs of a business warrants.

A continuing relationship was established rather than a one-time transaction taking place. A continuing relationship may exist where work is performed in frequently recurring although irregular intervals. The existence of a continuing relationship indicates an employer/employee relationship was established.

If a firm has to make a worker "understand" or "agree to" being an independent contractor (as in a verbal or written agreement), then the worker is not an independent contractor. An individual knows they are in business for themselves offering their services to the public and does not need to be made aware of, understand, or agree to be an independent contractor.

Section 31.3121(d)-1(a)(3) of the regulations provides that if the relationship of an employer and employee exists, the designation or description of the parties as anything other than that of employer and employee is immaterial. Thus, if an employer-employee relationship exists, any contractual designation of the employee as a partner, co-adventurer, agent, or independent contractor must be disregarded.

Therefore, the firm's statement that the worker was an independent contractor pursuant to an agreement that she would be responsible for her taxes is without merit. For federal employment tax purposes, it is the actual working relationship that is controlling and not the terms of the contract (oral or written) between the parties.

Based on the above analysis, we conclude that the firm had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business.
