

SS-8 Determination—Determination for Public Inspection

Occupation 09DVC.71 Truck Driver	Determination: <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Employee <input type="checkbox"/> Contractor
UILC	Third Party Communication: <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> None <input type="checkbox"/> Yes

Facts of Case

The firm is a trucking company is in the business of delivering various products to stores and business. The worker provided his services to the firm as a tractor trailer driver in 2011 delivering products for the firm to various businesses, and received the Form 1099-MISC for these services.

The firm instructed the worker to do all the tasks the job required such as; what to drop off and what to pick up, and they provided all the delivery locations. The worker received his assignments from the firm when he called in, or picked up the route information from the firm's office and the firm's dispatcher determined the methods by which the assignments were performed. If problems or complaints arose, the worker was required to contact the firm's dispatcher and the dispatcher was responsible for problem resolution. The firm required the worker to submit company fuel receipts and invoices. The worker's schedule varied based on the destinations. After the worker called in to receive his assignments and the route information, he picked up the truck, made the deliveries, and turned in all the required information to the firm's dispatch office. He provided his services personally on the firm's premises and their truck yard. If additional help was required, the firm hired and compensated the helpers.

The firm provided all the necessary supplies and equipment the worker needed to provide his services such as; the truck, fuel, repairs to the truck, insurance for the truck and the general maintenance of the truck. The worker did not lease any equipment nor were any business expenses incurred in the performance of his services for the firm. The worker received 30% of each load delivered for his services. The firm's customers paid the firm for the services the worker provided. The worker did not assume any financial risk in the relationship. The firm established the level of payment for the services the worker provided.

The worker did not perform similar services to others during the same time period. He provided his services under the firm's business name. Both parties retain the right to terminate the relationship without incurring liability.

---

Analysis

---

The application of the three categories of common law evidence to the available facts of the relationship indicates that the firm retained the right to direct and control the worker in the performance of his services. Accordingly, the worker was an employee of the firm for purposes of Federal employment taxes.

Worker status is not something to be selected by either the firm or the worker. Worker status is determined by the examination of the actual working relationship as applied to Internal Revenue Service code.

Hence, to clarify the Federal Government's position on worker status, we will be determining this case based on their common law practices in which the actual relationship between the parties is the controlling factor.

The firm instructed the worker regarding the performance of his services. A worker who is required to comply with another person's instructions about when, where, and how he or she is to work is ordinarily an employee. This control factor is present if the person or persons for whom the services are performed have the right to require compliance with instructions. Some employees may work without receiving instructions because they are highly proficient and conscientious workers or because the duties are so simple or familiar to them. Furthermore, the instructions, that show how to reach the desired results, may have been oral and given only once at the beginning of the relationship. The firm retained the right, if necessary to protect their business interest, to determine or change the methods used by the worker to perform his assignments. Integration of the worker's services into the business operations generally shows that the worker is subject to direction and control. When the success or continuation of a business depends to an appreciable degree upon the performance of certain services, the workers who perform those services must necessarily be subject to a certain amount of control by the owner of the business. The facts show that the worker was subject to certain restraints and conditions that were indicative of the firm's control over the worker. A requirement that the worker submit regular or written reports to the person or persons for whom the services are performed indicates a degree of control. The worker had a continuous relationship with the firm as opposed to a single transaction. A continuing relationship between the worker and the person or persons for whom the services are performed indicates that an employer-employee relationship exists. A continuing relationship may exist where work is performed in frequently recurring although irregular intervals. The worker rendered his services personally. If the services must be rendered personally, presumably the person or persons for whom the services are performed are interested in the methods used to accomplish the work as well as in the results. If the work is performed on the premises of the person or persons for whom the services are performed, that factor suggests control over the worker, especially if the work could be done elsewhere. Work done off the premises of the person or persons receiving the services, such as at the office of the worker, indicates some freedom from control. However, this fact by itself does not mean that the worker is not an employee. The importance of this factor depends on the nature of the service involved and the extent to which an employer generally would require that employees perform such services on the employer's premises. Control over the place of work is indicated when the person or persons for whom the services are performed have the right to compel the worker to travel a designated route, to canvass a territory within a certain time, or to work at specific places as required. The worker's services were under the firm's supervision.

The firm provided the worker with the necessary equipment and materials. The fact that the person or persons for whom the services are performed furnish significant tools, materials, and other equipment tends to show the existence of an employer-employee relationship. His pay was based on 30% of each load delivered for his services. The worker could not have incurred a loss in the performance of his services for the firm, and did not have any financial investment in a business related to the services performed.

The worker worked under the firm's name, and his work was integral to the firm's business operation. The above facts do not reflect a business presence for the worker, but rather, strongly reflect the firm's business. The fact that the worker was not closely monitored would not carry sufficient weight to reflect a business presence for the worker. In fact, many individuals are hired due to their expertise or conscientious work habits and close supervision is often not necessary. Either the firm or the worker could terminate the agreement.

Based on the common-law principles, the firm had the right to direct and control the worker. The worker shall be found to be an employee for Federal tax purposes.